THE BAUHAUS LEGACY

Functional architecture. The harmonious, symbiotic relationship between the architecture of a building, its interiors, and the setting. Mies van der Rohe's now famous dictat: Less is more.

Like an invisible hand, these ideals form the basis of modernist architecture and design that we take for granted. The legacy of a design philosophy that began in the Bauhaus school founded by German architect Walter Gropius.

Gropius's goal was to bridge the gap between craftsmanship and architecture, so that one no longer built a house, but invoked its totality, the Bauhaus. Bauhaus students studied pottery, typography, metalwork, weaving and carpentry, with many taught by progressive intellectuals like Paul Klee and Marcel Breuer, who would later become giants in their fields.

Following the closure of the school in 1933, Gropius, Breuer and Mies van der Rohe scattered across the world with their teachings forming the vanguard for the modernist movement, harnessing the legacy of the Bauhaus to produce enduring classics such as the Seagram building in Manhattan and Farnsworth House in Illinois.

A century later, the Bauhaus influence is far reaching and nowhere more so than in Cuscaden Reserve. For SC Global and long-time collaborator Soo K. Chan of SCDA, the roots and influence of Bauhaus lie deep; for Cuscaden Reserve their vision was to create a unified and coherent ensemble where Bauhaus principles were developed to suit modern needs.

With changes in family structures and how people live, Mies van der Rohe's open plan concept for the Farnsworth House is relevant once more, as the paradigm of spaces defined by fixed partitions becomes obsolete and new typologies emerge. Flexibility lies at the heart of Cuscaden Reserve, with apartments designed around a centralised core with sliding doors replacing walls to allow the resident flexibility in how they to change the space at will.

Just as Bauhaus practitioners took control of a project, SCDA's team curated the lush landscapes and designed all millworks, working with artisans to craft bespoke cabinetry and woodworks. And in a gentle nod to Marcel Breuer, the tower is lifted off the ground in a cantilevered fashion to allow the landscape to literally flow under and through it.

The result is a seamless design experience in harmony with its location, and a tribute to the centenary of the founding of the Bauhaus.
